Notes:

The Chameleon class ship is the companion ship to the old Mission class design. Both ships were initially built for Starfleet and both eventually became common sites in the civil sector- a testament to their dependable design. The Chameleon Mk I was a 1-2 man scout built specifically for low-risk scouting and surveying missions. Used primarily by Colonization Command, teams of Chameleons would descend on a newly charted world and scatter across the globe, analyzing and surveying different areas of the planet. By having several flights of Chameleons operate on the same world at the same time, surveying work was done quickly and efficiently. Indeed, like the Mission class, Chameleons participated greatly in the "Great Awakening". The Chameleon also served a vital role in The Four Years War. It was a fast and maneuverable ship and was perfect for clandestine scouting and spying missions.

The Chameleon was made available commercially by Starfleet after Project "Tradewinds" was mandated by the Federation Council. Project "Tradewinds" was developed to promote interstellar trade throughout the Federation. Like the Mission class, older Chameleons were decommissioned and sold at reduced rates and financed under special terms of Project "Tradewinds".

All Chameleons made available commercially were converted from Mk Is. Of the 912 Chameleons built, 282 Mk Is are still in service with Starfleet. Approximately 420 Mk IIs are in the private sector. The remainder is lost, destroyed, stolen or scrapped. The Chameleon is no longer in production.
